Trivia: The film, as well as the book by Lothar Gunther Buchheim on which it's based, are both loosely adapted from the wartime career of the Type VIIC boat U-96, and its skipper, Heinrich Lehmann-Willenbrock. Lehmann-Willenbrock ranked seventh among U-Boat skippers in terms of shipping tonnage sunk during the war (183,223 tons on three boats, the U-5, the U-96, and the U-256). After transferring to a new skipper, the U-96 was retired on 5 February 1943, one of the few U-boats to actually survive its tour of duty in the Atlantic. (more)

Goofs: Continuity: When the captain issues an order for a torpedo to be fired at the burning ship, he quotes a distance of 950m. Later he notes the distance as 650m in his log. (more)
